MIZUNO MX-200

£75 PER CLUB

*The looks of a better player iron
— yet with tonnes of forgiveness*

We defy anyone to look down at this and think you're hitting an ugly lump of metal.

This could almost pass for a better player's iron - it's that good looking.

It's aesthetically-pleasing - but it's also got a bit of meat behind it.

You might think that iron champions Mizuno only make great clubs for better players. You'd be wrong – and this stellar performer demonstrates why.

In short, the MX-200 was the best on test in the hands of our team. And with good reason.

The test team loved the look of the club; it's simple, yet doesn't appear hard to hit. An all-round winner.

It has a new 'Y Tuned pad' which, without getting too tied up in the technology, helps to reinforce the face of the iron and provides increased strength, power and great feel.

In fact, the guys had this pegged at full marks for these two categories.

They were right up there too in terms of forgiveness and the dispersion was pretty tight too.

The triple-cut sole of the MX-200s helps to reduce drag through the turf, which in turn leads to cleaner, crisper iron shots. In a game-improving iron, that's something to behold.

And, although we haven't talked much about sound in this test, there was little doubt that these produced a brilliantly powerful noise at impact.

The other great thing about Mizuno irons is that they are sold separately, retailing at £75 in steel and a tenner more in graphite.

This means you can build your set up gradually, rather than forking out a big lump sum in one go.

If you're after chunky, super-confidence inspiring irons there are bigger, more bulbous models on the market but this topped the lot on the day. If you want forgiveness with a touch of class, look this way.

Forgiveness has never looked so beautiful

Richard reckoned this is “an unassuming iron that not only looks the part but also gets the job done”. In terms of forgiveness these were as good as anything on test with the previously discussed Y Tune cavity pushing weight up into the toe area which means even your shockers aren't too shocking. John, who has a low ball flight, loved the high-launch qualities – which gave him more distance. These, and the MX-200s, prove Mizuno don't just do 'players' irons – they can do awesome forgiveness too.
